

A process for creating a polymer of increased flexural modulus, toughness and tensile strength, comprised of an interpenetrating network ("IPN") of a secondary polymer which is intensely dispersed within a first polymer, utilizing at least one isocyanate reacted with a catalyst. The composition has improved mechanical and processing properties rendering it useful as a moldable resin.